Washington, May 3.—Renewing what he called an "industrial revolution" by Postmaster General Burleson, the Postoffice Department today announced that it had decided to suspend the postal employees' right to strike. The decision was announced in a letter to the National Postal Union, which had been demanding the right to strike. Burleson's action was a direct challenge to the union's demand for recognition of the right to strike. The union had been fighting for this right for several years, and its demand was based on the principle that postal employees, like other workers, should have the right to strike for better wages and conditions. Burleson's decision was a clear statement that the government would not recognize the right to strike for postal employees.
